

Pagels, King write Judas book The Leader-Post (Regina, Saskatchewan) April 7, 2007 Saturday

The Leader-Post (Regina, Saskatchewan)

April 7, 2007 Saturday
Final Edition

Pagels, King write Judas book

BYLINE: Kevin Eckstrom, Religion News Service

SECTION: CHURCHES; Pg. G7

The Gospel of Judas caused quite a splash when it was published last year: Would it explain why he betrayed Jesus? Was this the "other side" of the story people had waited for? Would Judas be vindicated?

As it turns out, not quite.

Now, just in time for Easter, Princeton's Elaine Pagels and Karen King of Harvard Divinity School are putting the fourth-century manuscript in perspective in their new book, Reading Judas: The Gospel of Judas and the Shaping of Christianity.

King talked about the Gospel of Judas -- written in Greek, translated into Coptic and hidden in Egypt until it was found in the 1970s -- and why it tells us more about early Christianity than about history's most infamous turncoat.

(Soon after he betrayed Jesus, Judas died, although accounts differ on the nature of his death. He was replaced as the 12th apostle by Matthias, according to the Book of Acts.)

Q: This was written probably a century after Judas would have died. So if he didn't write it, who did?

A: We don't know. We just know it was a Christian writer who was very angry with other Christians who were encouraging their fellow believers to die as martyrs ... and bringing sacrifice (of martyrs) to the centre of Christian life and worship.

Q: So how did Judas' name get attached to it?

A: The author wants to make the point that the bishops in the second century, who claimed their authority from the 12 apostles, are wrong (in their support of martyrdom). So if they all got it wrong, who's left? Maybe Judas got it right.

Q: You write that this book teaches us more about debates within the early Christian community than about Judas himself. What do we learn?

A: We learn nothing new about Judas. We learn a lot new about the debates in the community over martyrdom.

Q: This is not a warm and fuzzy gospel. You describe its "strident, mocking tone and slanderous accusations." Where does that come from?

A: The Roman persecution was tearing the early Christian community apart, and this (author) was very, very angry. Whenever Jesus laughs in the Gospel of Judas, the reader should ask what are the wrong views that he's correcting.

Q: And what are those wrong views?

A: Several things. The author is arguing that the 12 disciples are worshipping fallen angels who desired the death and suffering of Jesus and his followers. This gospel says the true God and father of Jesus doesn't desire blood and sacrifice.

It also argues there is no physical resurrection of the dead. The argument is the physical body dies, but the spirit-filled soul goes to live with God forever. By promising martyrs that they'll have a physical resurrection, the Gospel of Judas is saying, that's a lie.

Pagels, King write Judas book The Leader-Post (Regina, Saskatchewan) April 7, 2007 Saturday

Q: All this talk about dying for God sounds a lot like the debate going on within Islam about holy martyrdom.

A: The most important lesson there is the way in which ... people who are arguing against giving yourself over to violence, who were arguing against martyrdom, were silenced.

The great history of the church called the blood of the martyrs the seeds of the church. The voices who said no to that, who said this is not what God wants, they were silenced until we found the Gospel of Judas.

What we're seeing now is those Muslims who want to criticize the suicide bombings are much in the same way being silenced, being told they're not real Muslims. We need to make space to hear the voices who are arguing against violence.

Q: Let's go back to the Judas we all know, and the most obvious question you ask in the book, which is: "Why would a troubled disciple betray his master, Jesus?"

A: This text is saying that he did hand Jesus over, but the handing him over was not a betrayal, but a revelation that death cannot kill the soul, that the Resurrection of Jesus is a spiritual resurrection.

Q: What do we know about the relationship between Jesus and Judas?

A: All we know is the very bare-bones picture, that someone inside the Jesus movement -- someone close to Jesus -- betrayed him. As the gospel got told over and over again, they were trying to answer this question, how could anyone betray him? They kept coming up with different answers --greed, disappointment, and finally they came up with this notion that he was following God in doing the right thing. But it's all speculation.

Q: Matthew's Gospel says Judas hanged himself out of guilt; Acts said he was disemboweled in a field. Does it make a difference why or how Judas died?

A: The Gospel of Judas says the 12 disciples stoned Judas to death, so they make him a victim of the disciples, the first Christian martyr.

LOAD-DATE: April 9, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: News

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 The Leader-Post, a division of Canwest MediaWorks Publication Inc.
All Rights Reserved